It's not the fault of ISPs, but regulation set by a small number of people gets pushed by ISPs. "In the US, the government's broadband-policy apparatus is one that prioritizes the proprietary business interests of big cable companies over consumers' right to freely and easily read, write, and share the content of their choosing – whether, for example, books, newspapers, blogs, or scientific articles." Clearly the author is a victim of government corruption! ~~~ tyingq Sounds more like the other way around, that regulators got the wrong idea about how the internet should be designed. that the terminal can emit a vibrational signal in a predetermined frequency band, so that the vibrational signal is detected by a detector. In the method, when the terminal is in a state where contact is established with the touch panel, when a user touches a predetermined position of the touch panel with the terminal, an vibrational signal is emitted in a predetermined frequency band, and the detector receives the vibrational signal. Therefore, it is possible to determine whether the predetermined position touched by the terminal has been touched by a user. In the above-described method, there can be provided a period, after determination is performed, during which the vibrational signal is emitted, and before determination is performed again. d0c515b9f4

Where to buy?Drink wasp or just a sweet taste of victory? Scientists say they have found the first evidence of a wasp alkaloid that kills an insect without causing poisoning or other negative effects to humans. Previously, one of the chemicals in the venom had been found to cause paralysis in humans. The new discovery, which the scientists made in their respective laboratories, adds three more to the four known wasp toxins, says Henrik Grønlund, a University of Tromsø biologist. The whole complex is called raphides. One of the new compounds, called raphides R1, was isolated from the venom of a species of the paper wasp Ropalidia marginata, and was injected into mice, where it killed them while having no effect on their metabolism. Thus, it behaves differently from the four known toxins. "It is the first time in nature that such a toxic molecule has been found," Grønlund tells Science. The discovery comes from toxicologist Rune G. Simonsen at the University of Copenhagen and from Grønlund and University of Tromsø researchers. There are dozens of species of Ropalidia wasps in North America and Europe, and each has its own venom. Some species hunt for prey and rob it of its soft exoskeletons to make a nest for their larvae. Others kill animals to use as
